Description

An 18th century lead glass hand blown water carafe with etched Adams' style design, circa 1780.

Adams style design, originating from the neo-classical period, is attributed to the English architect Robert Adam and his brothers in the late 18th century. Characterised by its elegance and symmetry, this style features ornate decorative elements such as delicate plaster work, classical motifs, and refined proportions. Influenced by Roman and Greek architecture, Adams style is known for its harmonious blend of simplicity and sophistication, often seen in both interior design and architecture, embodying grace and restraint.
